DEATH OF SCOTT KING ACCIDENTAL

Tuesday by a Record representative declared most emphatically that he and his wife did not commit suicide, as first stated in the daily papers.

Every one of Mr. King's Rainier beach friends scout the theory of suicide. W. S. Danter, than whom no one is better able to judge the lead man, does not for a moment entertain the belief of Mr. King taking his own life. Many other well-known business men of this section have expressed themselves as being unable to unravel the mystery but they do not believe it was a case of self-destruction.

In speaking of the sad affair, Mrs. King said: "I will not believe the report, and it seems cruel to even intimate such an action to so good and honorable a man. Mr. King has always been a model husband and to his children he was the most loving and tender of fathers. He had not a thought outside of his family and home. I never knew such a home man. We have never had a difference in our married life. He kissed me and the children upon leaving us and upon returning. Does a man who loves his family so devotedly commit suicide? Would he deliberately have left wife and children to battle with the world when his living would have made life easy for them? He has always done well by us. Look at our home—the home that he provided for us. Such men do not desert their wives and families under any stress of circumstances. My husband did not commit suicide."

When Mrs. King was asked whether her husband was in bad health, she answered: "Just about a year ago—it was in June—Mr. King took a trip to Alaska. He was a passenger on the Umatilla, when for twelve days she lay jammed in the ice. The experience was a dreadful one. He was a nervous man. The strain of those days when he could get no word to us and feared he might not live to see us again completely unnerved him. I went down to the dock to meet him upon his safe return from that voyage. I was shocked at his appearance, but I did not dare to tell him how frightened I was. From that time he frequently complained of pains in his head and he had bad headaches. Last month he recurred more often and he tried to be out-doors as much as possible, thinking the fresh air and sunshine would relieve the pain."

Last Thursday Mr. King mowed the lawn. When he finished he came into the house and said, "Lou, feel my hands. They feel so queer to me." I took his hands in mine and they were cold. I began to rub them without saying a word for I thought if I spoke he might think there was something wrong with him. He had then a sort of twitching about the mouth and a thin blue line outlined his lips. From his symptoms, I feared a stroke of paralysis. My theory is that on the next day while out in the boat he was taken with a stroke and lurched overboard. Scott was a good swimmer but if such an accident occurred, it will readily be seen how impossible it would have been for him to have saved himself or tried to get aid."

Mrs. King was asked whether she knew how Mr. King came to go away to Leach park, take a boat and go boating alone, when he was not feeling well.

"Why," said Mrs. King gently, "don't you see that is just what I am trying to show people. Mr. King had to have exercise. He needed a change. He was obliged to walk a good deal. When he started out last Friday afternoon, Donald, our boy aged three and a half years, called after his father, 'Don't forget my peanuts.' You will remember that in the pocket of one of the coats the bag of peanuts were found, showing that he had not forgotten."

"Mr. King, in my opinion, had no intention of going out in a boat. That was an accident and came from a suggestion. The boatkeeper at Leach Park noticed Mr. King playing with some children and laughing and eating with them. He was always fond of children. After a while he turned to Mr. King and asked him whether he would like to go out in a boat. It was a lovely day. Mr. King had taken the car up there for recreation. He thought for a moment, hesitated, and then decided to go out on the lake. It was not really his idea. He did not suggest it. Therefore, I feel that when Mr. King started out he had no idea that we would not meet again. Something happened to him. Just what, my always remain a mystery. Mr. King was a Mason. The Masons are trying to solve the affair and are rendering the greatest assistance. Everything that can be done is being done. They are leaving no stone unturned."

because Wheat had brought the remnant of his Enterprise stock up there to sell in competition with the home merchants. He said the trouble was caused by some young fellows who went there to "have some fun," but when called down by the auctioneer, started in to make trouble. They threatened to rotten egg the auctioneer and would have done so if given a chance, said the business man, who also claims the auctioneer was very abusive of the town.
